Since the transmembrane potential (TMP) of a cell is correlated with the level of metabolism, the effect of exogenous glucose (Glu) on the TMP in phytohemagglutinin (PHA)-stimulated human lymphocytes was investigated by means of fluorophotometry. The results indicated that (1) there is a slow reduction of the TMP of resting lymphocytes by a continuous presence of Glu, which may be a manifestation of modulation of the TMP by energy metabolism, (2) the effect of Glu is greater at a low concentration of Glu, and (3) the PHA stimulation further enhances the effect of Glu on the TMP. It was concluded that the TMP of human lymphocytes is modulated by Glu-utilizing reactions in addition to a primary metabolic control.

Peter, I think your idea is creative and is worth pursuing. We have been asked to assist with NYMEX (energy derivatives) to put a regulatory and legal team together to create an online commodity trading system similar to that being created by the Australian regulators. This team will be working in close coordination with Mark Taylor and Joe Hirko. We will also assist in putting a corporate compliance team together.
